Excerpt from Hawaiian Yesterdays: Chapters From a Boy's Life in the Islands in the Early Days

This delay was by no means a misfortune, for it gave the homesick young women a chance to dry their eyes and have a little rest before embarking on the deep. At last, however, the day of departure arrived, and at an early hour the missionary band was mustered upon the deck of the ship. A fervent prayer for fair weather and favoring gales was uttered by the repte sentative of the American Board, who had accompanied them from Boston; Captain Swain came from the cus tom house with his sailing-papers; the mooring-cables were cast off, and the ship was hauled out into the stream. It had been the intention of the commander to run down into the outer harbor, and, casting anchor there, to complete his preparations for going to sea; for the ship was yet far from being ready to leave port. But it was one of the most delightful days of the Indian Summer - the twenty-sixth of November. So, as the owner of the ship, who had accompanied the party down the bay, got into his boat to return to the city, he called out to the captain.
